Prevalence of enterotoxigenic and enteropathogenic Escherichia coli in faecal samples of children with diarrhoea in the Ashanti Region of Ghana. Enterotoxigenic and enteropathogenic Escherichia coli were isolated from 3,657 stool specimens obtained from children with diarrhoea in the Ashanti region of Ghana and were identified by immunoassay and/or laboratory techniques. Salmonella spp and Shigella spp were recovered from 17 and 9 of these specimens respectively. The remaining 5,565 stool specimens were negative for the detection of Salmonella, Shigella, Campylobacter and, to a lesser extent, E. coli O157:H7. This study found enterotoxigenic E. coli to be common among children with diarrhoea, with prevalence rates of 21.7% and 20.8% detected in immunoassay and laboratory preparations respectively, although no significant differences in prevalence rates between these techniques was noted. The majority of these isolates (64.8%) were of serogroup

O75/LT-1+ STa+ STb+ STaSTb+ LT+ LT-LT-. These same serotypes have previously been isolated from outbreaks of diarrhoea of varying severity within the Ashanti region. The presence of a number of the enterotoxigenic isolates indicates that there is a high risk of E. coli O75/LT-1+ being an enterotoxin producer.
